Foreword

The archaeological mounds at Rajghat represent the ancient city of Kasi or Varanasi on the right bank of the Ganga, located due north of the present day city. Krishna Deva was the first to authentically identify the site when he conducted excavations in 1940 on behalf of the Archaeological Survey of India and found the famous Gupta sealing with the legend 'Bārāṇasyadhishṭhānādhikaraṇasya' (the seal of the city administration of Varanasi).

Krishna Deva discovered, besides other antiquities, a large number of human and animal terracotta figurines datable from the Sunga-Kushan to the early medieval age. These important pieces remained confined in the Central Antiquity Collection Section of the Archaeological Survey of India in New Delhi and most of the terracottas were not published. Krishna Deva had made a reference to some of these pieces in his paper titled 'Excavations at Rajghat near Banaras' which was published in the Annual Bibliography of Indian History and Indology (Vol. III for 1940) from Bombay in 1944. I am happy to note that Dr. B.R. Mani located the objects and started working on the material and the catalouge is being published by him in collaboration with Dr. Arundhati Banerji.

I am sure the catalogue will find appreciation from the scholarly community and general readers. I congratulate the authors for the worthwhile venture.

Preface

Rajghat is an important archaeological site excavated by the Archaeological Survey of India under Krishna Deva in 1940 and later by A.K. Narain and his colleagues of the Department of Ancient Indian History, Culture and Archaeology, Banaras Hindu University in 1957-58, 1960-61 and from 1962-63 to 1960-69. The terracotta figurines are the most interesting class of objects next to seals and sealings found in 1940 excavations which revealed a variety of human and animal figurines. Though, found in all levels, the greater variety could be observed in the Gupta strata which represents the finest examples from this site. Mauryan level did not however, reveal any figurine and the number of figurines from the Śuṅga level is also very small. The Kushan level of Rajghat yielded along side the finished sophisticated types, degenerate archaic human forms with limbs shown in outlines only. The terracotta figurines from Rajghat are many for which no documentation has ever been done before. Therefore, the authors decided to bring out a Catalogue of this interesting collection from Rajghat, presently housed in the Central Antiquity Collection Section of the ASI at Purana Qila, New Delhi which is of immense value for the study of terracotta art of the Gangetic valley. A number of interesting and significant terracottas were given to the Bharat Kala Bhawan, BHU, Varanasi for display which are not included in this catalogue and may be published in future.

We express our deep gratitude to the Director General Dr Gautam Sengupta for his permission to prepare this Catalogue of Terracotta Figurines from Rajghat preserved in the Central Antiquity Collection, Purana Qila, New Delhi. Thanks are also due to the then Director (Pulication) Dr P.K. Trivedi for agreeing to spare the second author to work in the Central Antiquity Collection to utilize her valuable time in preparing the Catalogue. The photographs are taken by the Photo Officer Shri Rajbir Singh, Senior Photographers Shri Sovan Chatterjee and Shri Teja Singh of the Photo Section. Dr Vinay Kumar Gupta, Consultant (Editing & Publication) is responsible for taking some photographs, serially arranging the photographs and seeing the manuscript through the press for printing, so thanks are due to him. Thanks are also due to the Production Officer Shri Hoshiar Singh for monitoring the work in press. We are also thankful to the then Deputy Superintending Archaeologist Shri K.K. Sharma and Assistant Archaeologist Shri Sarjun Prasad of the Central Antiquities Collection, Purana Qila, New Delhi, for their co-operation and help in making the material easily available for the preparation of Catalogue. We express our deep gratitude to Dr Ellen Raven of Leiden University, Netherland for making available the paper contributed by Shri Krishna Deva published in The Annual Bibliography of Indian History and Indology (Vol. III for 1940) from Bombay in 1944. Finally, thanks are also due to Director (Publication) Shri A. K. Sinha and Superintending Archaeologist (Publication) Dr Madhulika Samanta for their cooperation in the publication of this book.

Introduction

The archaeological mounds at Rajghat (Long. 83° 1' 30" E and Lat. 25° 4' 30" N) represent the ancient settlement of Varanasi on the northern outskirts of the city near the confluence of Ganga and Varana. The credit of the discovery of this ancient settlement goes to Krishna Deva[1] who took up trial excavation of the site on behalf of the Archaeological Survey of India in October-November 1940 after a railway contractor reported ancient remains while digging for spoil earth in connection with extension and remodelling of the Kasi Railway Station.

The discovery of a sealing during the excavation inscribed in Gupta Brahmi characters as 'Bārāṇasyadhishṭhānādhikaraṇasya' i.e. 'the seal of the city administration of B(V)ārāṇasī' marked the site of ancient Vārāṇasī.

Excavations at three mounds at Rajghat were later carried out by A.K. Narain and his colleagues of the Department of Ancient Indian History, Culture and Archaeology, Banaras Hindu University in 1957-58, 1960-61 and from 1962-63 to 1968-69 without any break and substantial archaeological remains were noticed.[2]

Ganga takes a northerly course in Varanasi and therefore it is called Uttaravāhinī there. On the one hand such a situation added by the confluences of Varana and Asi rivers on the north and south respectively has made the city a sacred area where religious developments increased in the historical times. On the other hand the northerly course of the river has helped in reducing the volume of motion of flow which has also given a semi-circular shape to the left bank of the river making it suitable for anchoring the large sailing boats which were used for the riverine trade down the river upto the Bay of Bengal. Such a location of the city made it a great trading centre which emerged in the middle of the first millennium BC as an urban metropolis with localization and specialization of industries and crafts. The proliferation of the city is elaborately mentioned in the Tripiṭaka and Jātaka tales. There are mentions of ship-building industry, crafts of sandal wood, ivory, cloth praised far and wide for their value and beauty, boats sailing to Suvarṇabhūmi, location of ivory-workers street (Dantakāravīthi) within the city and specialized craft-villages in the vicinity such as village of carpenters (vaddhakī-gāma).[3]

The later excavations at Rajghat by the Banaras Hindu University suggest a cultural sequence beginning from Period IA which has been dated to around 800 BC. The deposit of Period IA represents pre-Northern Black Polished Ware assemblage having plain and painted Black Slipped Ware and Black-and-Red Ware which have also been found at Sarai Mohana[4], the site across the river Varana near Rajghat. Such cultural assemblage may be pushed back to the later half of the second millennium BC and thus the antiquity of Rajghat also can be pushed back to at least four to five hundred years earlier. Recent excavations around the city at Akatha and Ramnagar also support this early chronology.[5]

The city settlement at Rajghat which already had attained socio-economic prosperity during the pre-Mauryan times had also become great centre of art, culture and religion. Sarnath, the ancient Isipatana or Migadāva was selected by Lord Buddha to Turn the Wheel of Law in Motion. Subsequent Sanskrit literature also mentions Vārāṇasī as the city of Kāśī mahājanapada located along the Uttaravāhinī Gaṅgā in between Varaṇā in the north and Asī in the south. Such references are contained in the Matsya, Kūrma, Liṅga, Padma, Agni, Skanda, Bhavishya and other Purāṇas and Kāśi-Khaṇḍa. The sacred areas and sacred spots were identified and hundreds of temples and sacred structures were constructed in the Gupta and post-Gupta periods. Chinese travellers Faxian and Xuanzang also indicate such developments.

The elevated landscapes with three higher areas were conceived to be three sectors of the city, namely Oṅkāra-Khaṇḍa in the north, Viśveśvara-Khaṇḍa in the middle and Kedāra-Khaṇḍa in the south. The ancient city settlement of Rajghat falls under the Oṅkāra-Khaṇḍa with its highest plateau among the three, sloping gradually to the low inland ox-bow lakes of Mandākinī (modern Maidagin) and Matsyodarī (modern Machhodari).[6] One can imagine the extent of the ancient city settlement of Varanasi after observing the elevated area which is mostly occupied by medieval and modern buildings. Varanasi also became famous by other names, such as Ānanda-Kānana, Avimukta, Mahāśmaśāna etc. The earliest settlement located at Rajghat was definitely extended upto Lat Bhairava and Bakaria Kund areas from where significant early historic remains, sculptures and architectural fragments have been found. Kāśī-Khaṇḍa and Liṅga-Purāṇa also mention about a pillar at Koṭiśvara and called Mahāśmaśāna-stambha which has been identified with Lat-Bhairava which was probably an Aśokan pillar, described to be of 32 to 34 feet in height by the French traveller Tavernier and which suffered damage in 1805.[7]

Although natural soil could not be reached in the excavations conducted at Rajghat in 1940, five strata were identified suggesting five successive cultural periods ranging from Śuṅga, Kushan-early Gupta, Gupta, late Gupta and Gāhaḍavāla age covering a deposit, approximately of 7 m in total.[8]

The Stratum I yielded medieval Brāhmaṇical sculptures and a large number of architectural fragments suggesting remains of a Gāhaḍavāla period (1086-1200 AD) temple there. Two copper plate inscriptions of Govindachandradeva were also found. Village Bhadapa is mentioned in one of them which can be identified with the modern Bhadaun, a locality near the site.

The II and III strata were found badly damaged by the Railway diggings.

Stratum IV contained the largest number of structures, at least eight brick-built buildings, laid out in blocks which were separated by lanes and alleys. A rectangular structure about 19 m from east to west and about 16.5 m across with a quadrangle open to sky and a pillared hall in the middle with apartments enclosing it on the sides was expored. It might have been a temple. Other structures belonging to Stratum IV include a curious hall sunk with five masonry wells in its floor, a house containing a lime-plastered rectangular bathing tank, a house with an extensive paved court on which were found a pot with relief designs of flora and fauna, beside hundreds of clay sealings of which particularly important are the sealings of kings Dhanadeva and those bearing the representations of Greek gods and goddesses. On the basis of palaeography of the sealings this stratum has been assigned to the first to third centuries AD.[9]

The Stratum V represents structures of four house-complexes grouped into two parallel blocks, representing common residential houses. The remarkable objects from the stratum include an ivory seal-matrix and a clay sealing inscribed respectively with legends Phagunandisa and Balamitasa in the Śuṅga style of Brahmi. A silver punch-marked coin was also found.[10]

The excavator had also sunk two test pits below the levels of Stratum V where he found 17 storage pottery jars and in the lower level of the pits he found "basket full of highly glazed potsherds of thin fabric and usually of black and occasionally deep brown colour. This pottery is so characterstic of the Maurya period and is known from the lowest strata of sites like Bhir Mound (Taxila) and Bhitta....."[11]. The glazed ware apparently was Northern Black Polished Ware, a name of the pottery which was conceived later.

Besides hundreds of seals and sealings, the site revealed the find of several thousands of terracotta human and animal figurines, majority of which were found in the course of Railway diggings and a small number from the stratified levels during excavations. The excavator published only five of the terracotta figurines[12] and majority of them remained unpublished so far.

A note on the terracottas as extracted from the preliminary report by Krishna Deva is given below-

"Next to seals and sealings, the most interesting class of objects unearthed at Rajghat consists of human and animal terracotta figurines which turned up in several hundreds, displaying a rich variety of types. No doubt these were met with in all levels, but a greater abundance of these was in evidence in the Gupta strata which also yielded the finest specimens of this class. Among the figurines from the pre-Gupta strata is noticeable a curious admixture of completely modelled, partly cast and partly modelled and completely cast figurines, ranging from the crudest to fairly well executed types, evolved through several intermediate stages of progressive refinement. Unfortunately, no figurines came up from the Maurya and just a few from the Śuṅga level. The characteristic finds from the Śuṅga level are humans with broad and flat faces, animals stamped with rosettes and other patterns and votive tanks containing crude representations of humans, birds, snakes, ladder etc. The above-mentioned also came from the Kushan stratum which yielded, besides well finished sophisticated types, also degenerate archaic human types, some showing the limbs in bare outlines, others representing flattened bodies, pinched beak-like nose and wedge-shaped hands and feet. The process of refinement and sophistication of the terracotta art reached its zenith in the Gupta age which is illustrated by the numerous Rajghat specimens, in common with those already known from Bhita and Basarh. Invariably pressed out of moulds, these Gupta terracottas are characterized by sensuousness of modelling, exquisite grace of movement and posture, delicacy of expression and excellence of workmanship and finish. These terracottas share, in some measure, the amazing vitality and expressing qualities of the Gupta sculptural art. Another noteworthy feature is the fine painting of the lines and suitable colours, still preserved on some of the figurines. These show all variety of poses seated, standing, kneeling and reclining. Gods and goddesses, men and women, musicians and dancers, boys and children, soldiers and riders, animals and birds, - all varieties of subjects are depicted in multiple pleasing postures. We find on these such diverse themes as amorous couple engaged in love play, mother suckling the baby or hugging it to her bosom, young lady swinging in a cradle, rider galloping on a horse, monkey holding a fruit and so on. The religious figures include representations of Vishṇu, Śiva, Kārttikeya, Gaṇeśa, groups of Kubera and Hārītī and

11. Ibid.
12. Ibid., pl. III.

Śiva and Pārvatī. Among animal figurines the bull and the horse with their lifelike modelling are particularly remarkable. More interesting than these and decidedly the most artistic are the numerous human heads and busts which deserve special notice. These show exquisitely refined and expressive features with prominent nose, full sensuous lips, large charming eyes, fine forehead and gliding cheeks,- all set in a beautiful oval face. The beauty of these heads is enhanced by the charming style of hairdressing which shows a bewildering variety from the simple unsophisticated parting of hair to the most gorgeous coiffure. The commonest style of hairdressing combines simple parting of hair with curly sidelocks. In this the hair is first parted from the middle in straight sweeps and is allowed to fall below the head in a bunch of short curls, reaching up to the ears on either side. A variety of this style shows the curls ending in a few broad volutes which are generally arranged in three parallel descending rows. An elaboration of the same style is seen in some specimens where the simple central parting is substituted by a wavy one, the rest being common. Next in frequency occurs a type of hairdressing, showing very minute curls arranged in the fashion of a honeycomb. This has numerous varieties. It may figure on the two sides of the head with or without a jewel (maṇi) in the central parting or may be continued all over the head. Then again its shape varies on different specimens. It is horn-like when it occurs on sides and is sometimes crescentic in shape. The arrangement of hair in the form of a wig or veil or tiara is also of frequent occurrence. Occasionally also find the hair dressed on one side, generally to left."[13]

An attempt has been made by the authors to select the important terracotta pieces from the collection of 1940 excavations of Rajghat by Krishna Deva and to bring them to light for the first time ever since more than 70 years passed after the excavations. These terracotta figurines are preserved in the Central Antiquity Collection of the Archaeological Survey of India, housed in Purana Qila, New Delhi. The Catalogue also contains the measurements of terracottas which the reader may be able to compare with the size of similar finds elsewhere.
